Exploring Canada's gentle giants...

It's a big wide world out there, in fact so big and inviting that sometimes we forget to explore our own back yards. Intrepid's Katy Rockett put away her passport for this trip and felt on top of the world exploring in her very own homeland...

"While many people think Canadians go into hibernation the second the first snowflakes fall, and rightfully so, this is really quite a misconception. For many, this is the ideal time to experience the country in an entirely different way as the land truly becomes a playground. In our journey from Calgary, Alberta to Golden, British Columbia I had the opportunity to see mountains for the first time in my life. I fell instantly in love. The Rocky Mountains are first visible in the distance but soon engulf the landscape, surrounding you on all sides like gentle giants. Once we arrived at our remote cabin at the bottom of Kicking Horse Mountain in Golden, BC, it didn't take me long to rush to the base of the mountain so I could rise to the top, albeit with the assistance of a ski lift. Once the lift burst through the clouds, my jaw dropped and my breath escaped me, I barely noticed the below -30 degrees Celsius, as in front of me were majestic mountain peaks expanding as far as the eye can see. Never in my life have I felt like I was so much on top of the world and it was a moment I will not soon forget here in our very own Rocky Mountains!"
